Thursday, March 6 4-7pm

18444 N. 25th Avenue, Suite 210 Phoenix, Arizona

For additional information on this event, visit:

<http://jobs.thecoreinstitute.com/jobs>

Job Description

The CORE Institute is hosting a job fair. We are looking for positions in Medical Assistant, Front Office Representative, Billing, Collections, Patient Care, and many more.

Mission Statement: To continually define the standard of patient care through a commitment to excellence, innovation and learning.

Patient Care: Our first and foremost responsibility is to the patient; to provide state-of-the-art clinical orthopedic care in a courteous, compassionate, expeditious and professional manner. We are a nationally and regionally acclaimed center of excellence for orthopedic surgery.

Research: An integral part of providing value to patient care is performing quality research in the basic and clinic sciences. The Center for Orthopedic Research and Education Institute has established a nationally recognized orthopedic institute with a research focus in molecular biology, biomechanics and motion analysis of musculoskeletal diseases and injuries. Community Service: The Center for Orthopedic Research and Education Institute is a cornerstone of support for the Greater Phoenix and Scottsdale communities through outreach programs, education and service projects. Education: In addition to educating our patients, we are also providing education services to local residency programs, fellows and hospital allied health personnel. Our surgeons are national and international speakers and continue to publish journal articles and book chapters. The CORE Institute surgeons are the doctors who train other physicians in new surgical techniques.

Obviously, no one intends to ruin the conversations or relationships they are involved in! However, sometimes the way we speak and interact with others causes a disconnect when we need to talk about what matters most. During today's challenging times, we can ill afford to unintentionally offend others. When a conversation begins to go awry, most individuals are challenged to speak up because of what they perceive the negative impact may be to them.

Additionally, we sometimes have a hard time talking to certain people. Because we are all uniquely different, our communication style may be offensive to others or their style may offend us. Even though we don't intend to offend others, the way in which we think, communicate, and behave often becomes more of a barrier than we realize. Our individual differences show up in a display of different "Interaction" styles that are often misinterpreted. Understanding the differences in individual styles allows us to communicate and connect in a way that mutual understanding and respect is enhanced. In this session, participants will:

- Gain insight into our and others "interaction" style and communication preferences.
- Understand the difference in the "interaction" styles of others—how they think and communicate.
 - "Match" the styles of others to create connection.
 - Understand how to motivate others based on how they think.
 - Strengthen professional working relationships and engagement.
 - Improve ability to influence difficult people.
 - Enhance ability to resolve conflict.

Background - John R. Stoker is the Founder and President of DialogueWORKS

In this role John has worked extensively with a number of companies, helping them increase their capacity to enhance effectiveness and improve results.

John has experience in designing strategic change and in creating and implementing training curriculum in support of company-wide improvement initiatives. Prior to founding his own companies, he worked for a number of companies, where he focused on numerous change initiatives helping those organizations change their company culture to enhance quality and continuous improvement. He also designed, authored, and facilitated numerous training courses.

Areas of Expertise - John has dedicated over 20 years to improving the business results of leaders as a facilitator and coach, focused on the development of interpersonal skills leaders must have in order to lead. He is experienced in the fields of leadership, change management, dialogue, critical thinking, conflict resolution, and emotional intelligence. He has worked with clients both nationally and internationally; his list of clients includes Cox Communications, Comcast Cable, Banner Health, Wheaton Franciscan Medical Group, HCA Healthcare, Lockheed Martin, Turner Broadcasting, Eastman-Kodak, AT&T, OG&E, Alcon Labs, AutoTrader.com, Manheim Auto Sales, Maxum Petroleum, Cigna Health Plan, Nebraska Furniture Mart, and Honeywell.

Hottest Job Skill In Healthcare 1/9/2014

Among all the desirable traits of healthcare professionals, one is quickly becoming the most sought-after by employers. By Angela Rose for HEALTHeCAREERS.com Compassion, commitment, collaboration, attention to detail, and analytical thinking—these are all talents you need to succeed in almost any healthcare career. Yet, one less obvious is quickly becoming the hottest job skill in the industry—the ability to speak a second language.

According to CNNMoney, the Department of Labor expects interpreters to be among the nation's fastest growing occupations. In fact, they've projected a 42 percent increase in the field between 2010 and 2020. You don't have to make interpretation your career to benefit from foreign language fluency, however. For a number of reasons, bilingualism is increasingly valuable in most healthcare positions and organizations.

The U.S. population is diverse.

According to the Census Bureau, 58 percent of U.S. residents older than age five speak a language other than English at home. More than 37 million residents speak Spanish and almost 3 million speak Chinese. There are also large numbers of Tagalog (1.6 million), Vietnamese (1.4 million), French (1.3 million), German (1.1 million), and Korean (1.1 million) speakers across the nation.

They all need access to healthcare. According to the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, 80 percent of hospitals and 81 percent of general internal medicine doctors regularly treat patients who understand limited English. Sixty-three percent of hospitals and 54 percent of general internal medicine doctors treat this type of patient daily or weekly.

Communication is essential to patient care.

If a nurse who only speaks English needs to collect the symptoms and history of a patient who only speaks Chinese, it's certain to compromise the quality of care received. Similarly, a doctor who speaks only English cannot effectively communicate follow-up care instructions to a patient who speaks only Russian. However, if these healthcare professionals were proficient in the native language of their patients, they could ensure a satisfactory outcome.

According to the Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality, providers who can communicate with patients in their primary language achieve better results including, "greater patient understanding, increased satisfaction, better medication adherence, greater understanding of diagnoses and treatment, greater well-being and better functioning for persons with chronic disease, and more health education."

Using interpreters is problematic.

In the past, many healthcare organizations relied on patients' family members to act as interpreters or contracted with expensive freelance interpreters on an as-needed basis. This approach can be problematic since interpreters are not always available and unlikely to be on site for every emergency situation. When using an interpreter who lacks a background in healthcare or fluency in medical terminology, errors can occur. Additionally, reimbursement for interpretation costs is not always available.

Today, more hospitals, practices, and other healthcare facilities are seeking bilingual professionals to fill their positions. For example, a recent search of postings on HEALTHeCAREERS Network returned job opportunities for nurses, physician assistants, general medicine physicians, nurse practitioners, psychiatrists, customer service representatives, billing specialists, coordinators, and more, who are fluent in Chinese, Khmer, Portuguese, Russian, Spanish, and other foreign languages. If you're bilingual, highlighting this hot healthcare job skill in your cover letter and resume will set you apart from the competition when searching for the next step in your career.
